Correspondence of the Sentinel.

New York, Dec. 8, 1886.

My last concluded with a mere mention of the unpleasant, Thaberg, and the other, and the of D'Angi, who has recently made his debut at his concert. I know of nothing more difficult than to criticize piano playing of great excellence, or to distinguish between the merits of a good performer and one who is better, so I shall attempt no criticism, and shall only state the thousands who have heard Niblo's Saloon thoroughly, very few could tell who therein Sigmund Thaberg excelled the masters who have preceded him. But let that go for what it is worth, and also my impressions of the pianist performed. The appearance of the pianist is greatly in his favor. Modesty, which hardly seems natural, (taking into consideration his extensive fame, and those receptions which have praised the heart against his better nature,) pervades every movement, while his whole appearance of that clearly, well kept character, we notice so often in well to do and good looking Englishmen, in other words, there is much of breeding about the man, and his whole appearance, the elegance of his dress, and the grace of his movements, all combine to give him a very complete idea of him.

The programme opened with the first part of one of Beethoven's great compositions, piano and other, which, later, by the way, was admirably and, under the control of Beethoven. A piano generally suffers when coming into competition with a full complement of instruments, and I have often doubted the good taste in bringing them together, judging from the effect of the concert, that the piano was not the best instrument for the occasion. It is true that Thab-erg is a very good pianist, and that Thab-
